the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are aged 65 and over has increased from 10.5 million to 13.5 million, and the number of people aged 75 and over has increased from 4.5 million to 6.5 million (Office for National Statistics 2000).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of older people, and the need to ensure that they are able to live independently in their own homes for as long as possible. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the development of new housing schemes, the provision of services to support older people in their homes, and the development of new models of care.

One of the key challenges is to ensure that older people are able to live independently in their own homes for as long as possible. This requires a range of services, including housing, care, and support. The development of new housing schemes, the provision of services to support older people in their homes, and the development of new models of care are all essential components of a comprehensive approach to addressing the needs of older people.

The development of new housing schemes is a key component of addressing the needs of older people. This includes the development of new housing schemes specifically designed for older people, as well as the development of new models of care that can be delivered in a range of settings, including in the community, in residential care homes, and in the home.

The provision of services to support older people in their homes is another key component of addressing the needs of older people. This includes the provision of services such as home care, day care, and support groups, which can help older people to live independently in their own homes for as long as possible.

The development of new models of care is also essential for addressing the needs of older people.
